
It's a common misconception that limbo key software licenses are for real. They're not. Most often, the developers of these programs make a small adjustment to their numbers and make it look like limbo supports backslash, but in reality they use an escape sequence to do this work. Some people will even send you the key/serial number from their limbo installation as soon as you ask them for it. The good news is that there are still programs out there which really do give you your license key when asked - these include Vscod, Notepad++, luimme64free (whatever that is), and other programs like them. In fact, there are more programs that provide this function than not. However, these days, most of them do it with a web site parameter instead of a file. This is because the majority of them have no way to directly measure the length of a key or serial number - they can't use a device driver or actual filesystem methods to get the data. And in most cases, their key detection methods are merely back-of-the-envelope guesses at best. A program like Notepad++ has no need for you to install any kind of keygen because the developers understand that they will lose respect if their program gives away licenses to people who aren't willing to pay for it. These days, the only program which uses a file-based key is Visual Studio Code, probably for this reason. The only advantage of using a file-based method over a web site method is that you don't need to spend time copying/pasting your serial number into the web browser. However, now it's very easy for companies like Microsoft to use their own license servers to detect fraud so if you do use programs like these it's best to be prepared for fraud detection. There are some other programs on the internet that claim to generate licensing keys for software, but there is no way of knowing if they're real or fakes without downloading and trying them out on your own computer(s). If you do download one, make sure you proceed with extreme caution and that you investigate it before trusting it on a large scale. There are also some organizations on the internet which claim to give out licenses, but they seem to require fees to get them. These organizations tend to be confusing and contradictory in their statements. The following example of an "up-to-date" list of these companies was posted on 7/11/2016 on the Microsoft forums: Certified Keys is an organization that provides licensing keys for Microsoft products, but they require fees. A thread was started about them on the Windows 10 forums (dated 1/15/2017) where it was noted that their FAQ section claimed that they were "Closed for business".
