This week, two of Seattle's greatest allies—King County Executive Dow Constantine and U.S. Transportation Secretary Elaine Chao—were here. They joined dozens of local, state, and federal elected officials and business leaders as well as hundreds of construction workers and hundreds of proud and hardworking people who dedicated hundreds of hours to build new transportation infrastructure over the past four years. Here's why I was proud to be part of this effort: This is a great city and it can be even better. At a time when the state's largest-ever economic development package is making the rest of the country jealous of our prosperity and future, we didn't stop investing in our best assets and commitments. We invested in transit, creating 12 new rapid bus routes and opening five new light rail stations. We invested in streets, new bike paths, streetlights, and traffic signals. We invested in communities, with new housing in our south end and safe routes to school, a new high school, and new neighborhood businesses. We invested in roads, and we renewed our commitment to funding regional and local roads to keep our entire region moving. We invested in trails, and we're expanding our biking network in the south end, near the new home of the Sounders, in Fremont, and around the University District. We're doing all this in an economy where our ability to invest in the things we need most is as good as it's ever been, and will be even better with the passage of I-976, the state's largest-ever economic development package. We're focused on "making it here": creating opportunity for families and workers, moving people and goods, and delivering world-class infrastructure that makes the whole region better. We're doing all this in an economy where our ability to invest in the things we need most is as good as it's ever been, and will be even better with the passage of I-976, the state's largest-ever economic development package. We're proud to be leaders in the highest-ranked metro region in the country for economic vitality, quality of life, and opportunity. 2d92ce491b
