How to solve the problem A: I have the same problem and just did the following: Type notepad in the search box and press the Enter key. Search for and delete the following file: C:\Users\\AppData\Local\Temp \pip\cache\hachaphuone\hachaphuone-8.zip Unzip the newly created file hachaphuone-8.zip. It will take some time. Delete the cached file.\AppData\Local\Temp\pip\cache\hachaphuone\hachaphuone-8.zip. Re-install the pip package and try installing again. An evaluation of a three-dimensional filter for ultra-high-resolution CT reconstruction. A three-dimensional (3D) filter (3DF) is a highly-efficient image smoothing operator. For CT, the 3DF typically is combined with a volumetric filter (VF) for enhancing the visibility of the 3D anatomic structures. However, the method used to combine the 3DF and VF has not been well studied. To evaluate the combined performance of the 3DF and VF, a wide range of 3DF parameters were tested for a variety of clinically-relevant simulated lesions. A phantom containing 37 lesions with contrast densities ranging from 0 to 6 HU were examined on an Ultra-high-resolution computed tomography (UHRCT) scanner. For each phantom lesion, the following parameters were tested: filter size (F), phase distance (D), reconstruction method (R), and an index of 3DF gain (G). G = 0.5 corresponded to a 3DF without the VF. For each parameter, the contrast-to-noise ratio (CNR) was computed as the contrast divided by the noise in three regions: within the lesion, within the background, and between the lesion and the background. At F = 20mm, G = 0.2, and D = 0.75, the largest CNR was observed at R = 0 for all lesions, regardless of the G value. This set of parameters produced images with the greatest CNR. For all cases, the CNR was found to decrease with increasing G. For G = 0.3, the CNR was 3.3-7.4% lower than the CNR for G = 0.5. For each
