"These are people who are on average younger than other mental health patients," said Heather McPhee, lead author of the study and an epidemiologist at the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health. "They don't have chronic health conditions. They're not obese. They don't have other mental health conditions. They don't have addictions." The study, published in the journal JAMA Psychiatry, showed the number of people in the United States with bipolar disorder who received treatment from a general hospital increased from 8% to 19% between 2002 and 2011. In contrast, the number of bipolar disorder patients treated at mental health facilities increased from 24% to 40% in the same period. McPhee said the findings are consistent with a "hierarchy" of care. "Mental health patients will be seen in the setting that's more convenient to them, right? So if it's mental health, people will seek out the mental health treatment," she said. "The general hospital is the general hospital and you will seek out the general hospital because it's more accessible." The study was based on data from the National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey, a cross-sectional survey of the U.S 2d92ce491b
