Jan 8, 2020 Category:After Effects plugins Category:CompositingWe have developed a model of epithelial permeability to small ions. Using chorioretinal perfusion techniques and micropuncture of the blood/retinal barrier we have demonstrated that rabbits and rats have a finite permeability to hydrophilic small ions like K^+ and Cl^- , even though this tissue is highly impermeable to larger molecules. This permeability is important in the regulation of ion concentration in sub-retinal fluids. In our experiments both the rate and distribution of K and Cl transport across the retinal pigment epithelial cell varies with the retinal location. A major objective of this proposal is to define the molecular mechanisms responsible for this site-specific permeability.

To accomplish this goal we will study the effects of varying the cationic charge and molecular size of selected ionophores (e.g. tetraphenylphosphonium and valinomycin) on the rate and distribution of sub-retinal transport. In addition, we will study the ion binding characteristics of these same molecules on the apical and basal membrane surfaces of the retinal pigment epithelial cell. The availability of an in-situ perfusion preparation of the retinal pigment epithelium will make it possible to define more clearly the ion binding characteristics of these membranes. Studies on the nature of the transporter (non-ionic, ionic, and/or proton dependent) will be performed in both normal and inflammatory rat and rabbit tissues. We will also examine the role of lipoprotein lipase in the movements of short and long chain fatty acids across the blood/retinal barrier. Methylmercury impairs glutathione synthesis and increases
