Paul Croft / Getty Images HAVANA – When Danilo Carballo-Aguayo describes Cubans with a Twitter account, all but one photo is of his brother, a bearded computer programmer in a T-shirt and jeans who guides him through the new world on a smartphone and a charger. The only other Cubans with a Twitter account are the ones who have left the island since Fidel Castro died on Feb. 25. Over the past year, hundreds of the country's millions of Internet users have sent messages through the social network to other Cubans and to anyone who has internet access abroad. They have written about the new government's plan to build a state-of-the-art hospital, which officials say will be the best in Cuba and should be completed in the next two years, about the arrival of the first McDonald's in Havana and about the rise of Twitter in Cuba. They have also been sending their condolences after Castro's death, which set off a tsunami of anger and sadness in Cuba. When official news conferences and memorials ended, Cubans took to Twitter and Facebook to express their deep pain and outrage over the news of Castro's death, and the thousands of people who died in the Cuban Revolution. "Cuba has been isolated from the rest of the world 3ef4e8ef8d
