This question is not specifically about NASM, but about standard conventions. I am confused by how cdecl and stdcall behave in NASM. My understanding was that cdecl was a way of calling functions without using any of the stack, and stdcall was a way of calling functions without using the stack at all. Can this be true? If I have a function such as: extern _printf_extern _exit_extern _strcpy_ Is it required to switch to cdecl to make use of them? Or do they still behave the same way? A: It seems like you are confusing a number of things. cdecl and stdcall are processor-specific calling conventions for functions. Nasm has no idea what cdecl and stdcall mean, and simply uses the conventions that your compiler does. So yes, they work the same way as they do in most compilers (except that cdecl is better for memory-to-memory communication and stdcall for memory-to-stack communication, which is what most stdlibs do). Freelance Writer, Social Media Strategist, and Serious Eats Contributor How to Avoid the 'Net Stalker There are a lot of people out there who enjoy lurking on your social networks, hoping to catch you saying something that will embarrass you or your followers in a negative way, to which they can be the hero and provide a hilarious comic takedown to their friends and followers. Stalkers aren't always malicious, though, and they may not even mean to be. Instead, they're just enjoying being able to see what you're up to and what your friends are thinking of you and your life. And they're just as bored as you are. If you've ever felt like the internet has become an endless string of creepy messages and ugly comments directed at you, well, you're in good company. This is hardly a new problem. But social networking has made it much easier than before for stalkers to see who you're friends with 2d92ce491b
