Just get on a bus, a limousine, a plane, a train, or a tram and conduct yourself in a way that is guaranteed to get the driver's or pilot's attention. But what do you do when you're on a bus and there's no driver? Or a tram? In Paris, with the help of the Fire Department, the city's Transport Authority, and a team of civilian volunteers, Rapide has achieved a unique visual rebuke to the opposition to making rolling city buses cleaner. The team of mechanics not only washed the black off the city's rolling community buses but replaced the bodywork too, transforming them from black to white. Here's how it's done: Every bus and tram in the city of Paris has a rolling combination lock accessible from the front passenger seat. The brake pads on the wheels are accessible from the rear, and the entire vehicle is washed and waxed before the lock is opened. It's a handy DIY project that even allows passengers a chance to be involved (though not at the expense of the guard standing at the front of the vehicle, of course.)
