The Effect of Gender on the Response to the Smoking Cessation Treatment. This study sought to examine the effect of gender on the response to the smoking cessation treatment. This was a prospective observational study with a 12-month follow-up. In total, 314 consecutive patients who were smokers and admitted to the Department of Pulmonology of the Chest Diseases Hospital were recruited in the study. All of the patients underwent both pre- and posttreatment data collection (i.e., self-reported smoking cessation and exhaled carbon monoxide concentration (eCO) measured by MicroCO+ ) and 6-month posttreatment follow-up. The patients were divided into 2 groups according to their gender (male or female). A total of 313 patients completed the treatment and were included in the final analysis. No differences were detected in the smoking cessation response rates at the end of the first (61.3%) and sixth (59.2%) months of the treatment between men and women ( $P=.840$ ). Similarly, no differences were detected in the eCO reduction rates between genders ( $P=.451$ ). In addition, no difference was detected in the smoking cessation response rates at the end of the 6th month of treatment between smokers with 1 to 5 cigarettes per day (CPD) and  $>5$  CPD ( $P=.552$ ). Our findings suggest that gender had no effect on the smoking cessation treatment outcomes.

American Jewry has been rocked by the cruel murder of two rabbis in the ultra-Orthodox enclave of Borough Park in Brooklyn. Rabbi Chaim Kanievsky and Rabbi Moshe Twerski were ambushed by an attacker who used a hammer to hack at their heads while they were on their way to conduct a funeral. In a statement, New York City's chief rabbi, Howard Stern, declared, "We are on our guard against acts of violence." He called for people to remain calm. "Do not engage in acts of violence. Let us mourn," he said. In his address, he also pledged "Our hearts and prayers are with the families of the two rabbis who were murdered in New York City, as well as all of those whose lives have been altered by this loss," adding that he was on a "shared journey" with them
