We took our sons to go swimming at Laguna Beach, California when they were small. Though reluctant to plunge into the ocean, they warmed up to the water once they were in. After a few years of playing and splashing around, the winds changed and the water became too rough to enjoy. The boys learned to swim in their teens, but I would like to think they still come back to Laguna at least once a year. I discovered Laguna in my twenties, when I first moved to California. I'd spent the first twenty-five years of my life in the northeast. The sight of a crowded beach, as in Manhattan, at the foot of a magnificent mountain, as in the Adirondacks, was very unusual to me. And even more unusual was the thought of being there voluntarily, rather than being in the path of raging surf. But that's Laguna Beach. Long before you arrive, it's enveloped you with its beauty. There is nothing remotely like it anywhere in the world. Unlike any other shoreline in the country, which are high and rocky, or secluded, or generally off limits to people without a special permit, Laguna Beach is on prime oceanfront property. Even its rocky hillsides are on the ocean side. The sand is blue 3ef4e8ef8d
