A big part of cutting through the red tape of successful people is using the right tools for the job. In the personal, professional, creative, and entrepreneurial spaces, it's easy to come across "experts" offering slick, money-making advise about what they do. While valuable, these so-called "experts" aren't performing for you. "Performance" is another key, especially since "Personal Performance" is the "E" in the P3/E3/P3E3™ (Personal, Professional, Creative and Entrepreneurial Performance). As anyone who has been in the Personal Performance space knows, one thing that's pretty common is that personal stories and personal experiences can be powerful, compelling tools for unlocking "distributed power." Since it's been a few years since I wrote my previous article on this topic, it's time to update my definition of "distributed"... What's a "Distributed Content Performance Platform?" The key word here is "platform," as we're not talking about a "tool." An effective "Performance Platform" is one that makes it possible for people to perform as they authentically are. There's not just one kind of "Performance Platform," as there are multiple forms, including Performance Platforms for Creating, Thinking, Asking, and Thinking, Asking, Doing. I'm focusing on the latter, for now, since it's the one that's pertinent to the question of how to "cut through the red tape" of people, their professional performance, and their organizations. What's a "Distributed Content Performance Platform?" If your current "ba244e880a
