The development of the Rhino platform began in the mid 90s at Worleyparsons, and in 2002, the development team decided to spin out the company as a public company. For the first few years, Rhino continued to be developed in-house at Worleyparsons. As market demand continued, Rhino began to become a product, not a platform. Development occurred at the Office for Geographic Information Science (OGIS) at the University of British Columbia. The Rhino office was officially opened in 2007. The Rhino platform was formally released as a standalone product in January 2008. In 2009, Worleyparsons and its customers opted to switch development to the Autodesk platform, so that development could focus on producing the best product possible. The initial release of the Rhino platform was completed in August 2009. Rhino is no longer developed by Worleyparsons. A new Autodesk entity, Rhino Autodesk, Inc. is developing the Rhino product. Rhino is free to Autodesk customers and anyone with an Autodesk subscription. The first release of Rhino Autodesk, Inc. was in January 2014. Rhino is not supported in Rhino 6.
