5.why Are Many Strategic Alliances Temporary

A strategic alliance (also see Strategic partnership) is an agreement between two or more parties to achieve a set of agreed goals required in time. NATO is an example of a strategic security alliance. A strategic alliance has its own rules and laws. Typically, a strategic alliance is an informal organization whose members are united by common interests and goals, often to the detriment of their personal interests. Depending on the goals, the participants in a strategic alliance can exchange information and jointly look for options that are beneficial for all. A strategic alliance can be both voluntary and forced.
