Mice homozygous for a point mutation in their gamma-glutamylcysteine synthetase (gamma-GCS) gene have reduced gamma-GCS activity, increased glutamate cysteine ligase activity, and reduced glutathione levels. The mutation results in an activated forebrain astrocyte response to a fatal convulsant injury. The levels of several enzymes involved in glutathione synthesis are decreased in neonatal livers of these mice. This study investigated the genetic polymorphism of gamma-GCS in eight mouse strains. In C57BL/6J and 129SV/Ev mice, one of the two isozymes of gamma-GCS had six amino acid differences between the two alleles. The sequences of the two alleles were compared to the cDNA sequence of the only gamma-GCS allele in Mus musculus. One amino acid substitution resulted in a change in the predicted topology of the gamma-GCS protein. Thus, this amino acid substitution may affect enzyme function. The gamma-GCS alleles in C57BL/6ByJ, BALB/cByJ, DBA/2J, and A/J mice differed from one another by three amino acids. These polymorphisms were localized to a region in the gamma-GCS active site. This suggests that the polymorphisms are functional. Finally, the origin of the cDNA sequence was investigated in three other species. No evidence for two gamma-GCS alleles in Mus musculus was found. Thus, Mus musculus is the only species in which the cDNA sequence is believed to be derived from a previously characterized gamma-GCS gene.
