Approximate repeatability and reproducibility of measurements of intervertebral joint kinematics. The repeatability and reproducibility of intervertebral joint kinematics were evaluated in vivo for the purpose of providing precision estimates for clinical applications. Eight healthy volunteers (4 male, 4 female) were seated in a motion capture laboratory with their back to a 40 cm-diameter reflective marker array and video cameras positioned on a modified commercial dental chair. Subjects performed movements in the sagittal plane (flexion/extension) and coronal plane (left/right). Data from the middle thoracic segment (T7) of the spine were collected while the subjects performed 5 flexion/extension and 5 left/right trunk rotations. The repeatability was expressed by the standard deviation of the mean within-subject (within day) and the between-subject (between-days) for the measurement of intervertebral joint kinematics. The reproducibility was expressed by the standard deviation of the between-subject mean and the within-subject standard deviation. Repeatability of the flexion/extension range of motion
