The building is a rather small, quasi-ranch for officials from Milford Township in Sussex County. The town's Board of Supervisors meets in this building, but so does the township council. The police and the fire departments also operate out of the building. But in 2017, city officials got their wish to be separate from the township. Their wish was granted under a provision of the state constitution. The City of Milford was authorized to form into a Township Municipality when voter turnout was over 5% or there was majority white voter support. The provision, added to the constitution in 1967, is called a "merger" provision. But there are caveats. The city cannot be consolidated with an existing township. Members of the Legislature cannot be elected to both. Residents of the city cannot be counted in voting for the township supervisor. The results from the first election after creation were surprising, as a city proposal to form into a municipality was defeated. Only one of the six candidates for township supervisor received more votes in the election than the majority of voting population who voted in favor of Milford's merger proposal. The home rule charter Four years later, voters in Milford will have another chance to weigh in on the question of becoming a township municipality, but voters will not have to wait much longer to decide. The state constitution requires that the question be put to the voters within six years of the time that the city formed. This means that

Macworld Rating: Pursuit-based commerce (PBC) is the technology behind the KBA Impress card. Rather than purchasing store merchandise, you pay for it by sending a "purchase order" to a mail-order merchant; when the merchandise arrives at your door, the merchant pays KBA with your card. People have been asking if Apple would make a credit card for this ever since there was an iWallet. A KBA Impress card allows a person to order merchandise online, pay with it online, and have it delivered to his home. The Impress card is an embedded version of a KBA Impress card, with payment being accomplished via the phone. There's also a companion website with a storefront available via PC and Mac, where people can order from merchants all over the world. A few examples of merchants who have already announced they'll be accepting card payments are the Apple Store, OLK, and Starbucks. While I do not have any personal interest in a KBA Impress card, I feel that this technology, used by merchants all over the world, is very cool. Purchased with Privileged Password iPhone Over the last year, Privileged Password has slowly emerged as a solid security component in the iPhone. Starting as a way to unlock the iPhone, it has since added support for networking, messaging, and advanced lock screen features. The application is free for all users and is a very lightweight replacement for the built-in Password Reminder feature. In addition, the updates in Privileged Password version 2.0 try to eliminate the possibility of information being accessed from an iPhone after it is lost. The first version allowed the owner to recover PINs, SMS messages, media, and call logs with a few easy steps. Now, with version 2.0, the person who finds the iPhone can use the iPhone's Safari web browser to "recover" most, if not all of the information. For example, a lost iPhone might still have the web browser open with the home page active, and the username and password information might still be visible. When the user next tries to use Safari, the iPhone will remember the information. If one refreshes the "lost" Safari web browser, the username and password will be displayed. Not only is this behavior better than when someone discovers the iPhone, but it is actually better than any application that can access the iPhone's information (such as Password Reminder or Mailbox Recovery
