But even if a team chooses to remove the needs position from its draft board, it is important that it fills the hole it has with the best available rookie. So while there are thousands of hypothetical scenarios for which the Steelers could trade up into the first round or down into the second, there are two real-life examples of teams actively looking to trade into the second round to land a specific player. The first of these hypothetical scenarios, outlined by Foster in his most recent mock draft, comes out of Seattle, where third-year quarterback Russell Wilson is in play for a contract extension. With $44.3 million in salary-cap space this offseason, Wilson is eligible to enter the final year of his rookie deal, where he would have the option to enter into a three-year extension. Wilson, 23, is coming off a solid 2013 campaign in which he threw for 3,093 yards and 30 touchdowns to just eight interceptions. It was his best rookie season, but it was also the first time Wilson had played more than 12 games in his career. The Seahawks, though, may look to bring in a quarterback for the long-term. They've already been linked to the Rams' Janoris Jenkins, even though the team has an established
