What's New In Adobe Photoshop?

Q: Could a native browser's security help to protect against exploits on ios/Android? From a programming point of view, is it possible to protect against using exploits on ios/Android by having native browser (chrome, firefox,...) running on the device?

A: Yes, This is well known and has been actively researched. Apple has always been very careful to lock down phones with minimal or no user access. Aside from the Quicksilver exploit, the only viable attacks on a user's mobile device is one where the user knows the secret key, and is tricked into giving it to the attacker. This is possible on ios, but involves taking control of the phone and through something like installing a malicious app. A single user, assuming they know about the exploits and don't follow whatever "normal" user behavior you want to protect against, is the only one that could allow an exploit. iOS is much harder to get root privileges, it's much harder to install plugins. You have to either ask the user to install a malicious app, or trick the user into installing the malicious app, which is also a lot harder on Android. So, if you're thinking of locking out a user and making them install a browser, you have to have them sign into the website or, alternately, install the browser to a temp folder or something. With ios, you probably have to trick them into installing the browser to a hidden directory, while with Android you could conceivably trick them into installing the browser directly. Both of which are pretty much impossible to do after the user has installed any malicious app on the device. Making a phone hard to root is a very important thing. The reason everyone was upset about the Google Play hack was because they were trying to be something other than just a store. They were trying to provide protection against random apps installed on the phone, which is one of the primary reasons Android is as insecure as it is. Even though I found this question after asking it, I think that even if you can get a browser installed to the phone via a jailbroken iOS, Apple would try to prevent you from getting root. At this point, I'd imagine that Apple's security team is way better than jailbreakers.
