iMovie If you've ever used a standard video camera, you've used the iMovie _video editing_ tool. Essentially, it's the software that works with many standard-definition video cameras and can be used to make HD video clips. iMovie works with both Mac OS X and Windows, and you can download a copy for free. You can use this to create a custom video, but also use it for enhanced image editing, as well. If you want to make your own videos, you can download the software and start using it right away.

Switch to a high ISO setting If you find your image is too light, simply take advantage of the available settings and ISO (ISO) numbers. Adjusting the ISO on a camera that has a multi-ISO setting, auto ISO, or a built in flash will boost the dynamic range of your image. Auto ISO will adjust the ISO setting for you depending on the ambient light around you. A fixed ISO will set the ISO to a specific value. A custom ISO will set the ISO based on your shutter speed or aperture values. Your camera manual should provide more details about your camera’s Auto ISO feature. Flash Photography with a flash is obviously great for a variety of reasons, but it can make your image look flat and boring. Easily recover highlights and shadows You can easily recover the highlights or shadows in a photo through the Tone Curve feature. Expand your dynamic range Another way to improve your photos is to expand their dynamic range. There are two main ways to do this: Brighten the photo so more of the bright areas are visible. Drop the photo so it can capture more of the dark areas. Brighten the photo with the Tone Curve feature. Easily recover highlights, shadows, and blue skies Since we just covered how to expand the dynamic range of a photo, how about recovering the highlights, shadows, and blue skies from a photo? There are two ways to recover the highlights from a photo. Make the photo brighter so the details of the highlight areas are visible. Drop the photo to drop out the details in the highlights. Q: Printing the div tag to a PDF with AJAX in ASP.NET using C# I have an ASP.NET application. I have a HTML page which has a lot of tags within it. When I click a button it should go to a PDF printer. I did a research and understood that I can use an AJAX file to get the HTML content of the page and print it. I have already tried like below: AJAX content save to the text file. Then I am using the command line to print the file. I used a JQuery function $.get and append to an existing table the function draws the HTML table. But, either the second or third option didn't work. My problem is that once I click the Print button on the ASP.NET application it directly goes to a login page. After I am authenticated it goes to the PDF printer. But that too is very slow. I want my print function to run automatically after the button is clicked. Is there a way I can do that? I would really appreciate any guidance.
