Degrassi Junior High: Better Late Than Never Related Although there have been several incarnations of the show, to say that Degrassi Junior High is like many other historical Canadian teen shows is an understatement. It was the first show to portray teens as they really are. It is commonly referred to as The First TV show to depict drugs in a realistic way. It helped define the music and fashion of the late 1980's. It was the first show to feature sexual content and mature themes. It did a lot to push the envelope, and in many ways it was ahead of its time. The reason why I'm revisiting Degrassi Junior High, better late than never, is because the first fifteen episodes or so of the series aired in March 1986. The series was picked up by the CBC in 1987, and the rest is history. As this was the first Canadian teen show to depict the realities of teens in a family-friendly way, critics, parents, and policy makers from around the country attacked the show, criticizing everything from the clothes to the content. The show also drew the ire of the Catholic church, who felt that the show pushed moral issues too far. A set of sisters from the Congregation de Notre-Dame said that the show's creator, Linda Schuyler, should be put in prison for committing blasphemy. They later retracted their statement, and threw the book at the show itself. In the end, they were right. Degrassi Junior High did push the envelope, and did make some controversial statements, some of which have stayed with us to this day. However, all-in-all, it laid the groundwork for some memorable characters who would go on to play a big role in the world of television, movies, and music. Although I've only seen the first fifteen episodes, it was such an original and classic show, that it seems redundant to wait until the next season. The second season, which aired from 1987-1989, was the one that really made the show an institution. That's when the show received a lot of its detractors, when the story line and the general feel of the show stopped being satirical and started to feel a bit tired. The show also started to become a bit too full of itself, as the new cast began to brag about how groundbreaking the show was. They started to neglect the storylines that made the show successful in the first place. But as a high school teacher, I have to
