When you read about live streaming, there's this constant reference to cases where the stream isn't visually displayed. For example, Google Wave, Live.com, or Twitter. Is this always the case, or is there any chance for the stream to be displayed perfectly? A: Perhaps the most easily displayed example is the TV shows broadcast by networks like ITV, CBS, etc. these are not live, but the audience expects that the video is going to be presented in a way that is generally accepted to be non-live. Most live streams though are recorded at some point in the past. Those who record live video generally do so to capture a specific moment in time. These are more likely to be represented as single frames. There are also streams that may not even be recorded, only composed of a bunch of standard screen capture images, ie, you're just watching someone else's webcam live. Q: Use of strtotime() I was going through a tutorial online, and am confused. Let's say I want to make a function which stores the current date and time. So I wrote: $currentDate = "Date", date("Y-m-d", ""); $currentTime = "Time", date("His", ""); First I get the current date using the code above, then I concatenate the $currentDate variable with the $currentTime variable. But the tutorial used something else: $currentDate = strtotime("Date", date("Y-m-d", "")); $currentTime = strtotime("Time", date("Hi:
