Tilde can be expressed and treated in a way, that it is treated like a normal character, so you'll see both `~` and `~`. In mIRC's /help thing, a reference to a terminal's `~` is used to imply a "real" Tilde. The versatility of the macro is that it can be used to affect a series of variables simultaneously, to set them to the same value and then to merge them into one. In the following example we will merge the values of the variable `DU_GRID` which represents the current grid scale factor, `PIXEL_WIDTH` which is the current width of pixels in the current grid and `PIXEL_HEIGHT` which is the current height. These values are merged into one single scale factor. To do this, first we set the size of pixels to the new width and height, then we set the grid scale to the new scale factor. Then the number of grid cells is multiplied by the new grid scale and the value of `PIXEL_WIDTH` and `PIXEL_HEIGHT` is also multiplied by the new scale factor. You can also use the command to remove the grid scale from a variable, for instance to adjust a plane to match a terrain's grid scale. Just use the command like this: `/MEDITATE q1=scale weight=100` This will result in a plane that has a scale factor of 100, no matter what the plane scale is currently. The plane will be in the correct proportion to the terrain. This all sounds very useful but unfortunately there's one issue with it. When you try to access any variables you used to set the scale you will find that none of them has been set to the new value. The reason for this is because the `/MEDITATE` command doesn't really change the variables' values. It changes the way the variables are being displayed. If you look at the help file for the `/MEDITATE` command you will see that it provides a clear explanation of the difference between `/MEDITATE` and `/METHODS`. To be able to change the variables' values directly you must use the `/MEDITS`
