He's talking to reporters and supporters about his views on issues and policies in a manner that is more forthright than he has been for decades. Biden has barely started to act like a candidate with the two big Democratic Party contests in a little over two months away: Nevada and South Carolina. He needs to be mindful of that as he looks to shed the perception that he's a candidate who is of a different race than the rest of the field. "I have never thought of it as a weakness but I've always thought it was one of the things that made me a good candidate for vice president," Biden said last month when asked about his comments about working with segregationists. "When they [the press] asked me that, I said, �
