Effects of tramadol on plasma aldosterone and cortisol in chronic hepatitis C and hepatic encephalopathy. A depressive effect of opioid on aldosterone secretion has been well known in hepatic encephalopathy, but the data concerning this problem in chronic hepatitis C are limited. In this study we investigated the effect of tramadol (acetaminophen) on plasma levels of aldosterone and cortisol in chronic hepatitis C and hepatic encephalopathy. Thirty patients with chronic hepatitis C (group I), 30 patients with chronic hepatitis C with hepatic encephalopathy (group II) and 30 age-matched and sex-matched healthy subjects served as control group. All patients received tramadol and, 30 minutes later, plasma aldosterone, cortisol and liver function tests were measured. Group I had significantly higher plasma aldosterone levels when compared with groups II and control group. There was no significant change in plasma aldosterone levels in the control group and group II. Tramadol administration did not cause significant decrease in plasma aldosterone levels in both group I and II. Plasma cortisol levels were significantly increased in patients with hepatic encephalopathy, but there was no difference
