What's New In MysqlToExcel?

This is a small application that reads the contents of a MySQL database, maps the tables/columns to corresponding Microsoft Excel spreadsheet cells and then exports the results to the selected spreadsheet. The application is designed to connect to remote MySQL servers but it supports also local MySQL host. The application does not involve the permanent installation of an external MySQL manager, as it connects directly to the MySQL manager running on the local computer. The program is highly configurable, so you may establish the details for the transfer by manually entering the details or by creating an SQL query. MysqlToExcel allows you to export data for tables or from the entire database, select the output spreadsheet and any number of records per sheet. Alternatively, you can select the corresponding columns for the mapping or simply ignore them. The application also allows you to select the output encoding format, from the Latin1, UTF-8, UTF-16, UTF-32 and Unicode. The program allows you to import data from either local or remote MySQL servers, or it can also use SSH connections to establish a tunnel. The host name can be used as either the remote server name or the local host name. You can use a shortcut to start the connection and save it in the registry if desired. The program features a progress bar that indicates the duration of the transfer, as well as notifies you if any errors should occur. You can save the connection details so that you can simply load the profile the next time you wish to logon. You can run the program on windows XP or newer OS.
