It is an antiquated way of delivering public service. My graduate thesis is that delivery of public education (not necessarily Tribal) can be moved from the department offices, into something more proactive and innovative. I believe it should be delivered through schools that are more adept at delivering the curriculum and training teachers. There are some schools here in Utah that are great at it. In addition, it would be nice if the school districts would incorporate the extracurricular activities students might miss if they are in the school district and enrolled in the school that serves their tribal members, such as choirs or athletic programs. In general the school systems in Utah are a bit behind the state as far as education is concerned. I took courses at the university of Arizona and went to the University of Wyoming with my undergraduate degree. It is very hard to find out things you want to learn when it comes to education. Utah doesn't have the funding to educate the amount of people, but has the land for educational use. Bill Hausman- Editor of Red Rock Record The Utah Board of School Appeals, the lowest level of administrative appeal for K-12 education, does not permit the receipt of anonymous testimony. However, the number of participants is limited to 5. I'm trying to change this. There have been so many changes in school from the fifties through now- with virtually no continuity in the curriculum and modes of teaching. For example, for 7 years the kids didn't even have math. It was in the seventh grade. Current education discourse is about using technology, which is not a real "return" to educational innovation. I need to take this on. I'm a Utahns middle school and high school teacher. My passion is education innovation. I want to change what the schools do. Innovation is the way to get that done. 09e8f5149f
