Drug-induced hypoglycaemia is a side effect of many commonly prescribed medications in people with type 1 diabetes mellitus (T1DM), with potential morbidity and mortality. Although current guidelines recommend the discontinuation of offending medications, people can continue to take their medications and still develop hypoglycaemia. A systematic review of the literature was conducted on the basis of PRISMA guidelines, and 48 articles were included for analysis. The pooled prevalence of drug-induced hypoglycaemia was 10% (95% confidence interval 7-13%). Most studies had high or unclear risk of bias due to retrospective study design. The pooled odds of developing drug-induced hypoglycaemia was 5.65 (95% confidence interval 2.42-12.97) in people taking 2%. The odds of hypoglycaemia was not associated with the amount of insulin remaining in the body from a previous meal, time since meal, or duration of treatment. The odds of hypoglycaemia was also similar between the morning and evening time intervals and was not associated with a specific class of drug. A side-by-side comparison of hypoglycaemia incidence between these groupings did not demonstrate significant differences. People with T1DM taking insulin therapy and/or other hypoglycaemic medications are at high risk of developing hypoglycaemia, and a continued high risk of severe and fatal events exists as well. Future research is needed to delineate factors associated
