The "analgesic preconditioning" hypothesis was examined in LPS-tolerant rats pretreated with 5% lidocaine by the drug application model and by a single drug application model. In both protocols, the preconditioning procedure was effective in delaying endotoxin toxicity. The "analgesic preconditioning" was also shown to reduce acute pain as assessed by the tail-flick test after LPS injection. These findings support the concept that the "analgesic preconditioning" may protect against the septic state by improving endotoxin tolerance.Q: how to count header of flat file?
