The actress should consider an adaptation of Maryam d'Abo's "The Test of White" While Viola Davis seems assured of a place in the pantheon of black acting greats when it comes to the dramatic repertoire of her medium, in the realm of biopics her name could be better associated with stars of the screen, Oprah Winfrey and Denzel Washington. But she is about to fulfil a somewhat unexpected destiny of the kind that d'Abo herself enjoyed. With a film about the pioneering black physiologist Garvey C. Linder, starring her in the title role, Davis will finally be able to share her turf with the luminaries she remembers best from "Glory" and "42." "The Test of White" is the story of a bacteriologist who would overcome the racial prejudice he met in his research with tuberculosis. (Image credits: Viola Davis' website) "It's the story of a white woman who is diagnosed with TB," d'Abo tells VF.com. "She goes to see Dr Garvey Linder, who is at a time in the mid-20s and turns out to be a very early pioneer in the field of bacteriology. He's the only physician who gives her the benefit of the doubt after she tells him, rather than taking her for some mystical white witch, that she contracted TB from a black man." Unlike, say, J.J. Abrams, the way d'Abo, author
