Long-term therapy with intravenous or inhaled prostaglandin E1 improves the clinical condition in patients with congenital heart disease with pulmonary hypertension. Unfortunately, the drugs have substantial side effects, and these drugs must therefore be used carefully in patients with Eisenmenger's syndrome, which is a congenital abnormality of the venous return to the heart with a partial or total obstruction of the pulmonary circulation. During 16 months, 10 patients with Eisenmenger's syndrome were treated with epoprostenol and an evaluation was made of the efficacy and safety of the drug in these patients. Four patients with severe right ventricular failure did not respond to the drug and three of these died. Only one of the six remaining patients improved. Pulmonary pressures decreased by only 9.8% (p less than 0.001), with the result that the pulmonary-to-systemic flow ratio did not change (p = 0.9). Sudden drops in systolic blood pressure occurred during administration of the drug in three patients, but the hemodynamic state stabilized rapidly after the drug was discontinued. Hepatic venous pressure decreased from 16.6 to 14.5 mm Hg (p = 0.05). Systemic-to-pulmonary flow ratio and oxygen saturation were unchanged during therapy. It is concluded that epoprostenol does not have sufficient efficacy or safety to be the drug of
