The major difference is that the legal issues are addressed simply by changing the title. The game will likely always have that title, but the issue will be behind a new title. This allows for new companies to flourish or existing companies to stay. By having the game's title be a trademark protected name, companies can continue to do business even if the game company changes. Is there a chance of an IP dispute, not even from the community or the companies, but a developer who owns the trademark and/or other IP? Or is there a chance that a 3rd party could argue that they don't have to go by the same name/company/trademark as the original creators, even with the new IP/team? It seems that adding an IP date to the title/file name is a good approach in addressing these issues. That is, that it "should" be obvious which game the game came from, and the original IP is a given. No need to add the IP date there to be explicit. Ex:2) 2014 GTA 5: The game is the 5th installment in the Grand Theft Auto franchise. Ex:3) 2014 NCSU: The school has a student orientation and hospitality services company that used the name NCSU in their own, but with a new logo. Other than that, I agree with your points. How does one go about changing the title of a game to the name of a new company? Quote by sknott That is, that it "should" be

I have changed the IP date (which I think is best practice) to a random year and the case for a new IP is far more compelling. Both IP can survive in the same game, but one is stronger than the other.
