Reservations are essential and may be made through Bayview Thai or Beauty of Thai Cooking by calling (858) 566-1415 or (888) 566-1415.Q: How do I use the number of calls per minute in my log file I am doing some analytics on a java application in which I have also set up a periodic daemon that will poll some metrics and write them to a file. The metrics file has the metric value and the time of the last write. I would like to be able to read the log file and for each metric, see the number of times the metric was updated (if it was updated) and the corresponding time stamp. How do I do this in java? A: I would like to be able to read the log file and for each metric, see the number of times the metric was updated (if it was updated) and the corresponding time stamp. Sounds like you want to parse the log file to provide this information. You can do that using the standard Java library classes. You'll need a file format for the log entries, so let's say that each line starts with a time value, followed by a metric name, then a time value. The time value should be enclosed in quotes, because it's a string. You'll then need to split this into three parts, the time, the metric name, and the value. Here is an example of code which should work: String line = "1,a,1\t1\t32"; String[] parts = line.split(",\\s+"); long time = Long
