This study aimed to evaluate health-related quality of life (HRQoL) in persons with spinal cord injury (SCI) of different severities, with respect to the disease impact, the effect of any acquired body functions and functions of the environment, and the influence of comorbid diseases and impairments on HRQoL. A cross-sectional population-based study.

A rehabilitation centre in Sweden. The study population consisted of persons with SCI (N=167), and with different level of SCI and severity of associated diseases (from T1 to S). The outcome was measured by the Nottingham Health Profile (NHP). Impairment of sensory, motor, autonomic and sphincter functions were documented and mapped with the International Classification of Impairment, Disabilities and Handicap. The mean scores of the eight domains in the NHP, each self-rated by the participant with regard to his/her own health state, were calculated. The prevalence of reported severe health problems in the NHP was 24%; significantly more were identified in the more severely disabled persons. The prevalence of serious problems in the domains of Energy and Emotions were similar to the prevalence of serious problems in the domain Pain ($p=0.125$) and lower than the prevalence of serious problems in the domains Mobility and Sleep ($p=0.005$). After adjusting for impairment, the only domain that still differed between groups was Energy ($p=0.022$) and the difference between the sub-groups of 'moderate severity' and 'severe' remained almost unchanged ($p=0.035$). This study's findings indicate that persons with severe impairment of some acquired body functions and functions of the environment reported more often severe health problems. With the exception of Energy and Emotions, however, the health problems of persons with SCI of different severity and levels of impairment should not be underestimated.
