Decision-making and the elective removal of intussusception in infants and children. The objective of this study was to assess the decision-making of pediatricians regarding the elective removal of intussusception in infants and children. Retrospective, mail survey. A stratified, random sample of 80 members of the American Academy of Pediatrics was chosen from the American Medical Association master file. A 30-item survey related to the management of intussusception was mailed in the summer and fall of 2005. Response rate was 40.5%. Among 589 respondents, 83% currently remove intussusception as part of their pediatric practice. The respondents most commonly considered the size of an initial radiologic contrast enema (62%) and an air-filled ileal segment in an intussusception (58%) when evaluating the likelihood of an intussusception spontaneously resorbing. The majority of respondents considered a delayed voiding trial (87%) and a bowel preparation with a spasmolytic agent (59%) when a prolonged reduction of an intussusception was needed. Despite this, 14% of respondents would remove intussusception without using a bowel preparation. The majority of respondents considered a bowel preparation with a spasmolytic agent (87%) when a reduction of an intussusception was failed, as long as there was no intestinal perforation. More than half of the respondents would remove an intussusception after 3e33713323
