This post is part of Polyarchy, an independent blog produced by the political reform program at New America, a Washington think tank devoted to developing new ideas and new voices. It's no secret that our Electoral College system relies on a different set of rules from the Senate, since the same-size electorate gives every state one vote, regardless of population. In the political science literature, however, there's been little scholarship on what would happen if we adopted a congressional-style, individual-vote system for the presidency, which would greatly alter the stakes of individual presidential elections. The results wouldn't be good for Democrats. But they'd still be awful. It's a well-known (if underappreciated) fact that in federal elections, the states with the largest population tend to have 1cb139a0ed
