Advances in the use of microporous ion-exchange and molecularly imprinted polymers in membrane separation. Ion exchange membrane (IEM) technology has become a mainstream technology for treating industrial wastewaters. Ion exchange based on microporous, covalent, cross-linked polymers has many important advantages over traditional ion exchange resins in terms of performance, durability and regeneration. Microporous, covalent, cross-linked polymers are used for small molecules such as, ions, and are particularly attractive in the case of multi-ions based separation processes. Microporous, covalent, cross-linked polymers can be manufactured by non-catalytic cross-linking reactions in which monomers react with polymeric species and form covalent bonds under the influence of radiation, heat and/or sonication. A significant advantage of microporous, covalent, cross-linked polymers is that these polymers have a high chemical resistance to a variety of aggressive media.
