We evaluated the performance of a prototype integrated cell separator, the CS-3000, which is equipped with a newly developed system for the separation of leukocytes and platelets. The separation quality of leukocytes and platelets from healthy donors was examined using the Percoll density gradient separation method. Cell viability after separation was also examined. Moreover, the recovery ratio of the platelets separated with the new system was evaluated. As a result, the viability of the separated leukocytes was not significantly different from that of peripheral leukocytes, while the viability of the separated platelets was higher than that of peripheral platelets. The recovery ratio of the platelets was approximately 80%.
