Includes also simulation, evaluation and test software for data acquisition, signal generation, and controlThe present invention generally relates to protection of cardiac stimulator and pacemaker devices from electromagnetic interference (EMI). Various devices receive radio frequency (RF) signals and use a variety of RF power amplifiers to amplify the received signals. For example, RF power amplifiers are used in cellular telephones, wireless local area networks (WLANs), and television. This can be problematic for cardiac rhythm management devices and cardiac pacemakers, particularly for the increasing use of multiple frequency bands within the general cellular band of 800 MHz-2.4 GHz. For example, RF signals can interfere with cardiac pacemakers and/or cardiac rhythm management devices in the 900 MHz and 2.45 GHz frequency bands. This is the frequency range of some cellular telephones. In some cases, the interference with cardiac pacemakers or cardiac rhythm management devices can be so great that the devices will malfunction or be rendered ineffective. One approach to preventing these problems is to physically shield or physically block the noise or signal from coming into the patient's device. This is generally effective for single-band sources of noise. However, this may not be feasible for devices that transmit in several frequency bands.Pneumatic tool A pneumatic tool or pneumatic tool is a tool that includes the source of air pressure (usually CO2) and a hose that runs to the tool's tool bit and contains the air to push and direct the tool bit. It is a relatively new tool, meaning it has only become widely used in recent decades, replacing traditional hand tools and drills for most applications. It is the preferred tool to use for roughing out wood (using a hammer and chisel). The workpiece may be attached to the tool using a clamp, as with a drill press, or the tool may act as a stationary fixture against a workbench, with the workpiece clamped in place, the tool bit pressing the workpiece and the tool being moved by hand. There are numerous specialized tools such as those used 570a42141b
