The raster image is a two dimensional representation of a three dimensional object, whether a picture, photograph, a chart or a drawing, but this representation is not the same as the three dimensional object itself. Raster images are created by scanning or photographing the object, and, to maintain detail and clarity, the image is usually made to be smaller than the original object. Raster images are used for print media and for display in electronic devices such as computer screens and cathode ray tube (CRT) televisions. Computer software can be used to convert vector images into raster images. Vector images are not rasterized and can be used to make 3D models.
