Banks have become adept at finding ways to move money around in an instant, but they don't want to give up their information-sifting systems too easily. Commonwealth Bank is reportedly in talks with the Australian Federal Police to allow its customers to view transaction data stored in its bank notes. Transactions stored on the Bank of England's £20 notes will also reportedly include information on any third-party transactions linked to the bank, in a bid to make it harder for criminals to launder money. The World's Biggest Banknotes, courtesy of Commonwealth Bank. These are separate from the technology that will convert customers' old paper bank notes, which can be cashed at machines throughout the country, into digital notes that will be issued as cash. The new notes will be placed into circulation in a number of years, and will include an embedded EMV chip that will allow the bank and the person handling the banknote to identify information, such as a customer's PIN. Commonwealth Bank and the Australian Federal Police have had a close working relationship in the past. Customers will be given the chance to view their banknote information, but according to The Australian, customers will have to use a special machine with a scanner able to read the new information before cashing it. The new machine will be linked to Commonwealth Bank's eWallet system so that customers can view their current eWallet balance, for example, and pay bills or buy something. As well as creating bank notes that will be linked to the system, Commonwealth Bank is also working on a mobile app for people to send and receive payments, as well as an app that will help customers to find the nearest ATM. The new app, which is being built by the company's payment processing division, will reportedly be able to directly connect to ATMs and push a customer's transactions to their account. The bank is planning to put its new eWallet technology into use in the lead-up to Australia's peak bank holiday in July, which is traditionally the busiest time of the year for banks. "They [the app] will include the latest real-time information from the ATM network and the ability to initiate transactions from the app," chief executive officer Matt Comyn said in a statement. The bank's move is reportedly intended to help it stay ahead of competition from rivals like Westpac, who are also experimenting with paying customers' transactions via their ATMs.
