ago, we took an in-depth
look at how The Hunt
really happens in practice, and how it contrasts with

how it's depicted in popular culture. But how do "hero" teams get that awesome Hunt trophy? Chances are you've never seen or read about it. But the biggest and baddest animals in the world are hard to capture, especially if they're in the wild. So how do you ensure you're the one to end the life of a dangerous beast in the wild? With the use of tools and procedures. Fortunately, the hunt has evolved over time to make these animals easier to catch. Although your job on the hunt is still to take down a real animal, advancements in human technology have made it a lot easier to get close.

---

Check out our infographic below for the latest hunting methods,

tips and techniques.

C? I am working on a function that allows me to print the address of a column to the console. How do I get the line number for a given column number? I do not want to use the line number as the column number, since it might change depending on the file format I am using. I do not want to use the line number as the column number, since it might change depending on the file format I am using.

---

#include #include void
print_column_address(int column, char *string) {
int i; int column_num = column; printf("%s", (char *) string + column_num); i =
column_num + 1; while (string[i] != '\0') {

printf("%c", string[i]);
i++; } return; } int
main(void) { char string[]
= "Hello, World";
printf("The address for
the column %d is 0x%x ",

print_column_address(1, string)); return 0; } A:

Assuming that the file is well-formed (i.e., that the last line of the file consists only of a new-line character), then you can simply compute the line number by multiplying the column number by the number of columns in the file.

---

int
main(void) { char string[]
= "Hello, World ";
printf("The address for
the column %d is 0x%x ", 1,
print_column_address(1,
string)); return 0; } Q:
