Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a heat-applying test unit. More particularly, the present invention is directed to a heat-applying test unit that can be used to apply heat to a particular area of a substrate, such as a semiconductor wafer or an LCD panel, and to evaluate the continuity or resistivity of the substrate in that particular area. 2. Description of Related Art It is important to evaluate the continuity or resistivity of a substrate (such as a semiconductor wafer or an LCD panel) in order to determine whether or not the substrate is defective. For example, in the case of a substrate that has been fabricated on a semiconductor wafer, any discontinuity in the substrate will result in abnormal operation and, thus, reliability problems. For this reason, there are conventional test units that apply heat to test whether the continuity or resistivity of the substrate is defective. For example, known test units include a test head provided with a heat source that applies heat to the substrate, while a temperature sensor is arranged to directly contact the substrate so as to measure the temperature of the substrate. By comparing the temperature measured by the temperature sensor with a predetermined temperature, it is possible to determine whether or not the continuity or resistivity of the substrate is defective. While this arrangement can accurately measure the temperature of the substrate in order to determine whether the continuity or resistivity of the substrate is defective, it is still difficult to position the temperature sensor in direct contact with the substrate in order to accurately measure the temperature of the substrate.
