DuckDuckGo is a search engine with a bit of a twist. Instead of surfacing results based upon what has been indexed into the search engine databases, as is the case with many other popular search engines, DuckDuckGo searches based upon what its users are searching for. The idea of "duck diving" was popularized by Eric Schmidt in early 2000s, who reasoned that his company shouldn't only rely upon a database of indexed information, but should also be able to tap into the knowledge of the people using the system. The search engine was eventually made available to the public in August 2004, and since then, it has been continuously evolving. The website enables users to search for key terms that are typed into the address bar. When you use the search engine, you are presented with a large list of the most relevant search results from the billions of websites that DuckDuckGo has crawled and indexed. What's more, DuckDuckGo has developed many useful web tools to make your search experience easier and simpler. DuckDuckGo Search Features: Search For Anything DuckDuckGo endeavors to provide users with the most useful results from the web. The search engine is capable of simplifying queries that need to be performed on the internet. If you are running your web search using the name "DuckDuckGo", you can type queries into the search bar. The search engine gives you the option to search in one of three ways: with a keyword, or using a browsing path, or, if you are familiar with the search engine terms, by looking up the word or phrase that you are searching for. For instance, to search for "DuckDuckGo", you can type the word "DuckDuckGo" into the search bar and the results will be returned in a precise manner. You will also be presented with numerous tools and links to useful websites that are related to the term that you have chosen. This feature is of immense benefit to those who are completely new to the search engine, because the results will often include relevant links and websites that are either directly related to the term or provide information about a topic that is related to what you are searching for. DuckDuckGo's search engine terms are fuzzy by default, and thus, will return results if the provided words are similar to what is on the search
