method It is common for Clara Nunes to begin lessons by playing the song on the flute, which she refers to as the "mother." episode. I'm glad my family came up with that original name. But after that, things got freaky.

There is a short sequence where the characters exclaim "That's it", and the camera pans over to a nameplate on the wall which says "That's it!" It was a brief moment where I thought the show was going to be super meta, like, "It's not the same show anymore, you fools!" Instead, it was "I'm serious, people! This is the end!" Then the stories got very, very dark. If you stick around long enough to see the episode through to the end, you'll realize that the show has this long sequence of stories set out in advance, and even in early drafts, all of them ended in the same sort of thing: the main character went crazy. There was no way to win, no chance to make it all the way out of the woods without losing everything. I was getting tired of the character being totally free, with no real hope of success or failure. I think it made that single episode where it was clear that everything was over and everything had been said more intense than any other episode in the series. I think the show is determined to keep that feeling in any other episode, though. And I think it's a brilliant thing for a series to be able to do. One of the things I thought it was important to establish was that the characters in question were not

"good" people. They were loners, for the most part, people with a great deal of emotional scarring. I think it's very difficult to write a compelling character who is very aware that they were destined to fail, and who makes all of the decisions to ensure that that is the case. That was really a useful element of the show to keep in mind, and one of the reasons I think it was so difficult to write
