We're huge fans of the Brightbox app and the work they do supporting people with mental illness, so when they approached us to give them a testimonial we couldn't refuse. We were sent details about Brightbox, but we couldn't read beyond that. We're used to confidential mail, as it happens, but our curiosity got the better of us. We also love sales, so the thought of some free software was tempting. The app might not be for everyone, but we don't want you to miss out. So we're going to tell you how good it is. Because the app is specifically for parents and carers of people with mental illness, we only include scenarios that show how good the app is, rather than all the areas where it could be beneficial. So after reading our short description, would you use the app to help your family member? Take our quiz to find out how good you are as a parent"

Faced with the threat of destruction, most cultures have a tradition of coming together to pray. Although these traditions vary a bit from one culture to another, and often reflect local differences in economy, religion, and philosophy, they are still quite striking. In this book, Robert Orsi provides an account of how Christian congregations developed a spiritual ministry based on the Hebrew practice of praying together. He calls on his experience as a preacher to draw out the general features of this 'spiritualizing of prayer' and to make clear the inherent differences between prayer in Christian and Jewish contexts. The book explores not only the history of Christian prayer, but also the development of modern-day denominations. Four main points of development emerge. First, there was a 'dynamic' conception of the spiritual as a mystical relationship, rooted in the life and soul of the Christian, of which prayer was the language. This conception was accompanied by an awareness that the spiritual dimension was threatened by Christian attempts to systematize and rationalize prayer. Second, the relation between praying communities and their distinct religious traditions was ambiguous. Third, communities that practiced spiritual 'prayer services' tended to prioritize prayer over preaching and worship. Fourth, and perhaps most important,
