If I have a function with the following: void foo(int, int); Is extern required here? Doesn't this mean foo is a "separate" function from the one I defined? A: The extern keyword should be used if you have another function with the same name declared, but this other function is not called with the exact same parameters as the one declared by you. In your example, it's not necessary, because you're declaring a local function that is never called, and the other function, which has the same name, has different parameters. For example: int a = 3; void foo() {} void foo() {} int main() { foo(); } The function foo is defined in the library, but it's not called with the same parameters than the one you're defining (and because it's the same name, it hides yours). The same situation would happen if you defined a global function, or a function defined in a non-static class and then you tried to call it with a class member function, which has the same name. A: You have a function foo(). If you now include another file that declares a function of the same name foo(), then the compiler will not complain because it will assume that the other foo() is a different function. Now, if in that other file you have defined a function foo(int, int) and want to call it, then you need an extern for that. A similar situation happens when including C header files. The header file declares a function, but the compiler cannot know this due to some other 3e33713323
