Find out more about Photoshop at `www.PhotoshopResource.com`. By using layers, Photoshop produces a whole lot of organized work. The layers are arranged in groups, and the groups are stacked on top of one another. Most layers are visible or invisible. Only visible layers can be modified by the image-editing tools. You can combine layers to make new layers, and then combine those new layers with other layers. Photoshop creates a new layer every time it combines layers. You can merge or combine layers with layer groups, too. GIMP works the same way as Photoshop but is not as strong in its application when it comes to scaling large images. In addition to being the free, open source alternative to Photoshop, GIMP is very customizable and very powerful. In GIMP, you work with image channels, and you modify them based on the color of each channel. For example, you could combine a black and white image with a yellow channel to make a yellow image. You can apply and modify any channel from a GIMP image. GIMP layers are not organized into groups as Photoshop layers are. GIMP is best for those who like to play with a lot of the features and find them easiest to use on a more hands-on basis. A plethora of applications, such as Photoshop, GIMP, and many more, allow you to draw lines on your images to add more details. These lines are easily edited and can be even erased. Photoshop uses paths to create and edit the lines, and you can use GIMP's Pathfinder tool to draw and edit with a grid of lines. The Adobe Illustrator line tool does the same thing as the Photoshop path tool. You can choose to store your drawn lines as either paths or lines, and any lines you draw can be quickly selected or deselected using the Select tool. Figure 16-7 demonstrates some of the tools that come bundled with Photoshop. Figure 16-7: Draw lines in Photoshop to add detail to your photo. Photoshop's line tool has many options that enable you to make a selection of an object and simply click it to copy it to other layers or paths. You can also make a selection of an object or group of objects and then apply a layer mask to that selection.

Q: Is there any way to reset deleted items (animals?)? I want to be able to reset a deleted animal to whatever it was. Is there any way to do this? If there is some way to do it, is it possible to save the entire game to a file (as opposed to using cloud saves)? I know that saving the game will keep it for when you log in the next day. A: Currently, you can't. This has been stated in previous answers, but it is an intentional decision by the company. Here are some ways you can use to save the state of the game: Cloud save Save the game while in pause mode, and they will be saved to your cloud save account. The game will be saved in the same place that your cloud save is located (apparently this may not work with all systems, so you might need to research if your specific system has an equivalent to pause mode). Save the game multiple times Save the game while in pause mode, and make the additional saves in game itself. The game should save this data to local storage, and the save button in pause mode should load this data in the next game. If you have a Japanese PS3, I believe that this data should also be stored in the PSN cloud saves as well, however, there is no confirmation of this, just speculation. A: There is an unofficial app that will allow you to relive your deleted memory. They are called "Autosave +", which restore deleted memory to the last autosave, allowing you to play all of your deleted games/content multiple times. It's only compatible on the Vita version of the game, as far as I know. If you don't own that, you're out of luck. Autosave + works with the following games: Axis Cop: Criminal Subversion Funeral Parlor Killer? Mischief Makers OutRunners Sorry, there's no way to do this on a PC version (not for information purposes, but rather for copyright reasons). You would not be able to play those games if you deleted them. A: Sadly this answer is not entirely correct In the PS3 version of Everybody's Gone To The Rapture you can do this manually by searching for items through your inventory then pressing the Confirm button.
