The first police officer in the Seattle metropolitan area to use facial recognition cameras in the field has said the tool has a 99.6 per cent match accuracy rate, allowing officers to quickly zero-in on wanted people. The police department in Kansas City, Missouri, has about 6.4 million mug shots on its computers and a facial recognition search engine running on a 24-hour, around-the-clock basis. "It is quite accurate in matching up to a 99.6 per cent, so it's extremely good," Chief of Police Ron Laymon said. The officers are able to search using pictures from drivers' licenses and their arrest photos. Instead of having to do manual searches of case files, it has been a labour-intensive process which could take an hour of time. It now takes only seconds, he said. Chief Laymon said he uses the tool to pick out people of interest. "We're much quicker and more effective," he said. "Since I started using it, we've already made 46 arrests." The department is in the process of procuring its own cameras and will begin using them to help nab wanted people in the streets. Chief Laymon said the police department already uses the tool on other people involved in crime, but the new cameras will enable the department to use it in public. "It's very, very effective." Friday, September 28, 2009 Jai Kaur: Learning outside the box Jai Kaur's story, being the daughter of Gurmeet Singh's disciple, now 26-year-old Priya Kaur is a very interesting one, and I am sure that after reading her story, we can all say that we have had many a break through moments, where we have crossed a new line where we thought that we couldn't go, and that we can't go. But if Jai Kaur didn't take that break through and pushed through, who else can say, that we will be able to cross that
