Once you learn Photoshop, though, you can quickly move to the next level and unleash your creative powers. Starting with a blank canvas With Photoshop, you start with a blank canvass. Any photo can become a masterpiece in Photoshop, as long as you have a good understanding of the program. With the right training, you can be an expert in Photoshop, as shown in Figure 14-1. Photoshop uses a layer-based system for editing. Figure 14-2 shows a blank image, the background layer (the colored ground), and then six other layers over the top of it. The blue background layer represents the image, and it's the one that your image is based upon. Figure 14-1: Start with a blank canvas when you open Photoshop. Figure 14-2: Every image can be opened in Photoshop. Designing a sexy and pretty sidebar Try this simple exercise to show you how Photoshop can assist you in your design work. To begin, create a blank canvas and resize it to 2 inches by 5 inches, as shown in Figure 14-3. Drop a new layer on top of the canvas and call it Background. In the Photoshop Layer palette, right-click the Background layer and select Create Clipping Mask. Figure 14-3: Create a canvas with the measurements you need. In the background layer's clipping mask, you see an area that acts as a guide for the image. You're creating a new layer with an offset of 10 pixels on all four sides of the canvas. When you create a new layer, it's automatically the active layer, as shown in Figure 14-4. Any change you make to the image is made to this layer. When the layer is active, you can use the Move tool (the black arrow icon) to manipulate the image in any direction. Figure 14-4: An active layer acts as a guide when working in Photoshop. Select the Move tool and drag it across the image, positioning it within the clipping mask guidelines in the background layer. Click to make the move permanent. You see the blue area extend as the Move tool is moved along the guidelines. When the move is done, you see your outline as a blue rectangle around your layer, as shown in Figure 14-5. You can press Ctrl+T (⌘-T) to temporarily turn the move

Positive density dependence in sexual reproduction and evolution of life history trade-offs. Somatic conflict is ubiquitous throughout nature and is often partly fuelled by phenotypic trade-offs that arise among resource allocation priorities for competing somatic functions. In this contribution we highlight that a previous conceptual model of how positive density dependence can evolve during a sexual recombining life history is in need of critical revision. In particular we show that several non-adaptive processes can cause 'starvation' or 'competition' to evolve with a negative genotype-density/phenotype or phenotype-density relationship, where the phenotype or genotype influence the allocation of resources to somatic or sexual functions. This is in sharp contrast to the 'competition for r-resource' model based on the Hardy-Weinberg principle, which predicts a positive genotype-density/phenotype or phenotype-density relationship. We contend that the conceptual model of how positive density dependence can evolve as a result of sexually recombining life histories needs to be revised and particularly include consideration of resource allocation trade-offs when considering the evolution of sexual reproduction. The invention relates generally to pipe laying apparatus, and more particularly to devices for laying a pipeline on a sloped surface. Pipelines are typically laid on a sloped surface in a trench. Typically, a pipeline is laid first in a substantially horizontal orientation. Then, the sloped surface is excavated to a predetermined depth to accommodate the pipeline which is to be laid in the substantially horizontal orientation. The sloped surface has a predetermined slope with the distance from the top of the slope to the bottom being indicative of the length of the trench needed to accommodate the pipeline. As the pipeline is laid in the trench, additional of length is added to the distance between the top and bottom. After the pipeline has been laid in the trench, it must be filled with dirt or other material to hold the pipeline in position. Thus, the top of the pipeline must be substantially flush with the top of the surface of the ground and the bottom of the pipeline must be substantially flush with the bottom of the trench. It is an object of the present invention to provide an apparatus for laying a pipeline on a sloped surface, the pipeline having a predetermined slope, in which the distance between the top of the slope and the bottom of the pipeline is a predetermined quantity and the pipeline is laid in a trench with the top of the pipeline substantially flush with the top of the surface of the ground and the bottom of the pipeline substantially flush with

The World Health Organization has been trying to reassure the public that the coronavirus is not airborne. As we've seen in other outbreaks, this has sometimes been difficult to do. The coronavirus has been spreading rapidly around China since late last year. It was first identified in December and caused death and illness in China in the same week that the disease reached Germany. Cases have since been reported worldwide. People first became concerned about the coronavirus after seeing a large cluster of pneumonia cases in the Chinese city of Wuhan, a center for epidemic prevention and control. Many of the people in the cluster have died. First, experts thought the virus was a new form of the influenza virus — like the swine flu that hit the world in 2009 — or a new type of coronavirus like the one that causes the common cold in humans. But Chinese health officials found some similarities between the two types of coronaviruses: They both seem to spread through air particles. Now, in an emergency "summits" with top scientists and doctors around the world, the World Health Organization has said that the coronavirus is not infectious by air. "I want to set the record straight. It is safe to say that according to the current scientific understanding, the virus spreads through person-to-person contact," WHO director-general Dr. Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus said. The virus only spreads from person to person when it's inside the body. It can live for several days outside the body in the environment, but WHO spokesman Christian Lindmeier said it does not appear to remain infectious outside the human body for longer than about an hour. "People have been getting on planes and flying to other places, and if anything, there were higher numbers of passengers with the virus in the last few weeks, and there weren't any clusters of cases among the flight crew," he said. Airlines should "be asking their cabin crew to do a high-risk assessment of the passengers, and if they're not feeling well, to send them to the hospital," he said. "So it's not airborne at the time." World Health Organization Health workers in China collect samples for testing for the new coronavirus during the Lunar New Year holiday in January. But WHO has also made clear that it doesn't know where the virus originated, so that it's likely the virus will spread even beyond China
