Get to know FIFA and the people who make it with the official FIFA 20 Ultimate Team Guide. FIFA 20 features a number of familiar faces, while introducing a few new faces to the mix. Some of the biggest changes are up front. New additions like the goalkeeper taker function and more reliable save-throws have been added to improve ball-orientation. The momentum system is also being altered for better control and smoother goals. Most importantly, contextual chat during online matches has been rebuilt to feel more natural and players can adjust their communication settings to suit their preferences. Content on this page comes directly from press releases and fact sheets provided by publishers and developers and was not written by the Game Revolution staff.

Q: Does Tuple.operator() takes an argument? Consider the following code : std::tuple t1 = std::make_tuple(1, 2); std::tuple t2 = std::make_tuple(1, 2); int x = t1.operator()(1, 2); Now, is t2.operator()(int, int) overloading is automatically considered when t1.operator() is called? Is there any difference if I write : int x = t1.operator()(1, 2, 3, 4); A: Your question is not well-formed. The operator() member function does not overload on the second parameter and if you call it as std::tuple::operator()(int, int, int, int) you are passing an extra argument. As such, this would not compile. That said, if you are asking if the operator() member function of the tuple type is called implicitly when you call operator() on a tuple literal, the answer is no. You have to call it explicitly to call operator() on your tuple. You can verify this with a simple example: #include int main() { std::tuple t1 = std::make_tuple(1, 2); int x = t1.operator()(1, 2); return 0; }
